Public Safety Emergency Communications is a no-fail service. In the past decade, Nashville experienced natural disasters including historic flooding, devastating tornadoes, a global pandemic spanning multiple years, and a man-made disaster, caused by a lone bomber detonated an RV next to critical telecommunications infrastructure; rendering critical communications pathways inoperable for more than three days. To properly plan for and mitigate against future threats to emergency communications infrastructure, we must explore partnerships with solutions allowing carrier redundancy and geodiversity ensuring public safety emergency communications professionals can continue to receive calls for help and send the correct response to the correct location regardless of the impact to critical infrastructure. This proposal and the associated pricing terms are a fair reflection for a solution designed primarily to support limited remote work or to more broadly support full activations when critical incidents occur.
