It includes, intimate partner violence, child abuse, elder abuse, sexual assault, trafficking, and stalking; and

WHEREAS, the consequences of experiencing interpersonal violence are pervasive and enduring. Evidence confirms that exposure to violence increases the risks of injuries, infectious diseases, mental health problems, reproductive health problems, and noncommunicable diseases, loss of income and personal autonomy; and

WHEREAS, the job of IPV Advocates is to provide crisis services to help victims of violence and trauma navigate the overwhelming journey towards physical and emotional safety, healing, and renewed hope; and

WHEREAS, due to the traumatic nature of this work, these IPV Advocates often experience a unique occupational challenge called vicarious trauma and compassion fatigue; and

WHEREAS, vicarious trauma and compassion fatigue are often experienced by Crisis Advocates from witnessing the pain, fear, grief and terror that trauma survivors have endured or are enduring. As a result, these helping professionals can experience fearfulness, sleep loss, intrusive thoughts, worries, nightmares, diminished joy, and hopelessness in their own lives; and

WHEREAS, 50% of crisis response professionals experience severe traumatic stress, 34% meet PTSD diagnostic criteria from this secondary trauma exposure, and 37% experience clinical levels of emotional distress associated with compassion fatigue; and

WHEREAS, the Metropolitan Government recognizes that the chronic exposure to the trauma of others is an occupational challenge for these IPV Advocates and values the importance of trauma-informed work environments through policies, procedures, practices, programs, funding, and work culture; and

WHEREAS, a day of appreciation is warranted to bring attention to the exemplary work of these IPV Advocates; and

WHEREAS, it is fitting and proper that the Metropolitan Council establishes the last Monday in April of each year as Interpersonal Violence Advocate Appreciation Day as part of National Crime Victims' Rights week and urges all citizens of Nashville to support local efforts to assist victims in finding the safety, help, and healing they need.
